Americans should be free to express their dislike of the President and his administration using all available tools from the associated technology companies without fear of retribution of either themselves- or the involved technology companies. Holding tech companies accountable for the content produced by Americans is ridiculous. Likewise- if an American corporation decides that a customer of their service should not be allowed to espouse hatred on their service, they should be able to cut ties with that customer. An American corporation is not required by law or by any stretch of the imagination to propagate propaganda because our president demands it. It's time for our president to exit his weird belief that the majority of Americans with a brain stem love him- and wake up to the fact that Americans are free people who only remain great if they are able to exercise their freedom of speech and expression.
